Introduction

There is little information on captive Pteronura husbandry and management, biology (esp. reproduction and physiology), and physical and mental/behavioral health that has been maintained, studied, published or shared among zoos. Little communication and cooperation exists between many institutions holding this species. Few zoos have exchanged giant otters across, or even within, international boundaries. Many zoos now already holding giant otters are in need of mates for individuals held singly or in single sex groups or are in need of unrelated animals to prevent further inbreeding. Very few zoos in the world have had successful reproduction. A great number of litter losses occurred because parents, stressed by human disturbances and presence, failed to properly care for their cubs. This species requires very special and complex care and housing facilities to rear offspring with success. Often enclosures have been designed without these considerations in mind. It is not uncommon that giant otters are housed in inappropriate conditions, i.e. without enough land area because of inappropriate land to water ratios or enough soft loose natural substrates. Unfamiliar otters are sometimes introduced incorrectly. Appropriate/safe medical vaccinations for some diseases are not available or are not used in many countries. Severe inbreeding was likely to have prevented the survival of any of the cubs born at one institution. (The total number of cubs born at the aforementioned institution represents a significant number of litter losses compared to the historical number of cubs born worldwide). Cub, juvenile, and sub-adult deaths resulting from medical illness not related to litter loss caused by human disturbances, remain a problem and this aspect is largely unstudied on an international level.

As a result, many problems have existed worldwide and historically (Sykes 1997-99; Sykes-Gatz 1998/2002 & 2001 and unpublished reports). These problems include high cub mortality, a small population, severe inbreeding, mental, behavioral, and physical health problems, injuries, deaths, and a significant number of potential breeding otters being held singly or in single sex groups. As well, many questions still exist about this species in captivity. If these problems are not resolved, creating a healthy self-sustaining captive population will be impossible. The captive population may also soon disappear and this may pose a greater threat to the already endangered wild giant otters.

Giant otters in zoos can play an important role to raise public awareness about this endangered species (IUCN 1999) and its habitat. Studies on P. brasiliensis in captivity have contributed to overall knowledge and conservation/management strategies for this species in the wild (Schenck, pers. comm., 1999). For example, because very few P. brasiliensis field studies exist, research on life history data (i.e. morphology, reproductive characteristics, dietary habits, behaviors/vocalizations, genetics, etc.) of captive animals is used as a reference source for wild populations. Also, the discussion of a captive P. brasiliensis cub death due to parvovirus (Wünnemann 1992) inspired Schenck, Staib, and Storch (1997) and Schenck and Staib (1998) to conduct a study on the influence of domestic animal diseases on P. brasiliensis wild populations/survival. Additionally, Wünnemann (1992) reported captive born litters that failed to survive because the mother was under stress (i.e. as stress induced milk-deficiencies have been caused by human disturbances). This study was taken into consideration when strategies were developed for eco-tourism management in protected P. brasiliensis habitat in Peru (Schenck and Staib 1998). Studies on captive individuals have helped to develop/improve management/conservation strategies for wild populations. It is important to note that some of the information needed can not be acquired through parent-reared cubs in captivity or in the wild (i.e. the disturbance would negatively affect cub-rearing success), but instead it only can be gathered from handreared cubs. Other information although, such as estrus cycling and earliest age of sexual maturity etc., can be collected from otters in captivity.

The participation of all zoos/institutions holding this species within the international giant otter studbook is urgently needed. Institutions that participate in the studbook should fulfill the recommendations within the giant otter husbandry and management guidelines. The goal of this studbook is to encourage better record keeping, communication, and information sharing and increase awareness of the existent problems and encourage actions needed to resolve them. This studbook also aims to further conservation support and promote research into the management and biology of this species in captivity that may not only benefit captive P. brasiliensis, but might as well, help conservation efforts for giant otters in the wild. This is necessary to help improve husbandry and management practices and increase the number of potential breeding pairs, the number of successfully reared cubs, and the size of the small captive-born population so that a healthy self-sustaining captive population can be created. It is also essential to help conservation efforts in the wild.

All institutions holding giant otters need to participate within the studbook, keep thorough documentation, openly communicate and share information, and be supportive of and actively responsive to the efforts to create a healthy self-sustaining captive population. It is essential that they provide the very special and complex care and housing facilities needed to keep giant otters and rear offspring with success. All zoos/institutions holding this species are obligated to support conservation efforts by at least helping to increase public awareness about the critical situation of wild giant otters and their habitat and by keeping the husbandry records, recommended within the husbandry and management manual, that can be used to aid field research. Additionally, they should do as much as they can to support other conservation efforts. Zoos/institutions who wish to acquire giant otters should be “in need”, have experience keeping giant otters, and also fulfill the aforementioned requirements. These facilities should be given first priority to receive any available giant otters. An institution “in need” is one that is in need of mates for individuals held singly or in single sex groups or is in need of unrelated animals to prevent further inbreeding. It is crucial that all holding institutions be open and willing to exchange otters with / transfer otters to those zoos that fulfill the requirements listed above.

Over the past years and in regards to captive giant otter issues, much work has been done to stimulate and maintain international communications, conduct comprehensive world-wide census, husbandry, and management surveys, publish papers, organize and attend giant otter in captivity meetings, and develop and distribute husbandry and management recommendations. Participation and support for the studbook has also been encouraged. Much communication has been oriented to individual conversations with zoo/institution personnel, field biologists, conservationists, and to those who made contact through the IUCN Otter Specialist Group or other avenues. This has served as an effective way to exchange husbandry and management information and advice with zoos/persons and exchange information with those who work with conservation issues. An informal international network has been established to help achieve all of the aforementioned goals. (It would be beneficial if the studbook and husbandry and management recommendations could be available in multiple languages. Efforts will be made to accomplish this within future editions.)

This Introduction is an excerpt from the “Husbandry and Management of the Giant Otter (Pteronura brasiliensis) 2nd Edition: International Giant Otter Studbook Husbandry and Management Guidelines.” Compiled and Authored by Sheila Sykes-Gatz. Published by Zoo Dortmund, 2004. A complete overview of the problems and guidelines for the care of giant otters in captivity can be found in the aforementioned manual.

Contributing Institutions/Individuals and Acknowledgments

Without the information provided by the “South American Giant Otter (Pteronura brasiliensis) Husbandry, Management, and Historical Census Survey” (Sykes 1997-99) respondents and all those who contributed information in the years during and following the survey period, this studbook and the husbandry and management guidelines would not have been possible. These persons and institutions are listed below. Their invaluable contributions and time are greatly appreciated.
